friends from different cultures,” says Guldbrandsen. “Along with being rewarding professionally, this project has been wonderful for my family.”

As a city built on the labor of immigrants, Manchester provides immigrants in low-tech, low-wage jobs from meat-packing plants to textile mills during the 19th century. Manchester is an desirable place to live for many. “We know immigrants who know the mayor and the past priest. They made their way to Cairo and began the wait—three long years—for their refugee emigration paperwork. Mongkuier and Yak, along with his teenage nephew, are now settled in Manchester, N.H., with their new baby daughter. They do not fear for their lives for this. For they are unspeakably grateful. But they endure a new kind of hardship now, the pain of separation from their loved ones. They know it will be many years—if ever—before they see their families again.

“I just completely admire them,” says
Emelia Smallidge ’04, an anthropology major who drives to Manchester twice a week to tutor Sudanese refugees. Yak and Mongkuier, her most enthusiastic students, have become friends as well. “In anthropology classes, you learn there are all sorts of different people in this world,” says Smallidge. “And you know people have a lot of hardships. But when you’re sitting next to a laundry. She sits down next to $20,000 needed for airfare
phones, is one of the resources they’re doing something.”
—S.C.

friends from different cultures,” says Guldbrandsen. “Along with being rewarding professionally, this project has been wonderful for my family.”

As a city built on the labor of immi-
grants, Manchester provides immigrants
in low-tech, low-wage jobs from meat-packing plants to textile mills during the 19th century. Manchester is an
desirable place to live for many. “We know
immigrants who know the mayor and the
past priest. They made their way to Cairo and
began the wait—three long years—for
their refugee emigration paperwork. Mongkuier and Yak, along with his teenage
nephew, are now settled in Manchester,
N.H., with their new baby daughter. They
do not fear for their lives for this. For
they are unspeakably grateful. But they endure
a new kind of hardship now, the pain of
separation from their loved ones. They
know it will be many years—if ever—before they see their families again.

“I just completely admire them,” says
Emelia Smallidge ’04, an anthropology
major who drives to Manchester twice a week to tutor Sudanese refugees. Yak and Mongkuier, her most enthusiastic students,
have become friends as well. “In anthropology classes, you learn there are all sorts
of different people in this world,” says Smallidge. “And you know people have
a lot of hardships. But when you’re sitting
next to a laundry. She sits down next to
$20,000 needed for airfare
phones, is one of the resources
they’re doing something.”
—S.C.